BUILDING BLOCKS

Commentary: Ensure general, subcontractor deal is solid

PORTLAND, Ore. — By definition, general contractors are caught in the middle between their owner-clients and their subcontractors: owners hold them responsible for their subcontractors' work, and they must make sure their subcontractors stand behind their work.

A well-drafted subcontract helps a general contractor navigate these often-tricky relationships.

Here are the first two of five questions for general contractors to ask about their subcontracts. Check back tomorrow to see the remaining two questions:

1. Is there any daylight between the general contractor and its subcontractor?

A general contractor wants to make sure subcontractors' obligations are, at a minimum, equal to its obligations to the owner.

To accomplish that, subcontracts typically include a "flow down" clause, which obligates the subcontractor to assume the same responsibilities to the general contractor that it assumes to the owner.

Beyond that, a contractor should make sure important subcontract terms are consistent with the prime contract. For example, indemnity to the owner should not be broader than a subcontractor's indemnity to the general contractor. Otherwise, the general contractor will be left holding the ball if it can't pass an indemnity obligation to the subcontractor.

2. Is the prime contract properly incorporated into the subcontract?

To ensure obligations under the prime contract flow down to the subcontractor, the subcontract should clearly state which terms of the prime contract are incorporated into the subcontract.

A blanket incorporation of the prime contract into the subcontract is usually a good idea, but it may not be enough. If there are important terms in the prime contract that need to be incorporated, make sure they are.

And the subcontract should state which terms control if there's a conflict between the prime contract and the subcontract. At the same time, avoid incorporating terms that should not apply. For example, incorporating a prime contract's liquidated damages provision may limit a delay claim against the subcontractor.

Monroe planning to spend $9M for fixes at 18 pump stations

MONROE, La. — The city of Monroe is pursuing about $9 million in upgrades to its 18 stormwater pump stations, with major improvements to be completed at eight of them.

Charles Westrom, the city's sewer manager, said specific projects are planned for those eight pump stations, and two projects — the addition of backup generators and installation of a supervisory control system — will benefit all pump stations.

He said the city is using about $800,000 in capital funds to replace all three engines at the Rochelle Pump station.

Westrom said the new engines are expected to be delivered in about 21 weeks.
